Fat Freezing F.A.Q's

1. What is fat freezing?

Fat freezing (known as Cryolipolysis) is a proven noninvasive procedure, which involves using ice technology that results in localised fat reduction. The technology behind fat freezing was designed and developed by dermatologists at Harvard Medical School, which revealed that fat cells are more responsive to the effects of cold in contrast to the surrounding tissue. Fat cells crystallise at lower temperatures than skin, muscle and nerve cells.

2. How does it work?

A special handpiece consisting of vacuum suction and cooling plates is positioned on the selected body area. The area is first warmed to help separate the blood from the fat cells, then chilled. Fat cells have a lower temperature tolerance, which mean they are destroyed at lower temperatures. Once crystallised, they no longer function in their usual way, and breakdown (Apoptosis) via the body's natural functions. This results in the elimination of the fat cells without damage to the surrounding tissues.

3. Is it permanent?

The fat cells that will be crystallized through the fat freezing procedure are absorbed into the system before being flushed out by the lymphatic system via the body's natural processes. Once destroyed, the same fat cells cannot grow back as long as you maintain a healthy lifestyle.

Before and After

Our reviews from the clients

Very nice team that explained the procedure clearly and could answer all the questions I had. I can see a difference on my legs and stomach already. I can't wait to see the final result.

Laura, 32, London

I was initially apprehensive but everything was explained to me thoroughly before I had it. The first few minutes were uncomfortable and I felt like my skin was being pinched really tightly but I was reassured that this feeling would pass and after 5 minutes the discomfort was gone. The next 25 minutes seemed to pass quickly and the sensation was similar to a slight heaviness on top of me. It's rare that I get the chance to lie down for half an hour and do nothing so I found the experience quite relaxing. I felt absolutely fine afterwards and have had no bruising. I would highly recommend this treatment.
